And loft me dreaming, love, of thes!"

"Oh! no," the uniden cried;
"This shining ring to bright, but cold:
That bond is loosely tied
Which must be clasped with gold!
The ring would soon forgotten be;
Some better gift I'll give to thee!"

"Then give me that red rese."
Said I, "which on thy bosom heaves.
In ecstasted repose.
And droups its blushing leaves:
If thou wouldst have me think of thee.
Fair maidun give the rose to me!"

"Oh! no," she softly said, "I will not give thee any flowers:

This rose will surely fade;

It passes with the hour:

A faded rose can never be

An emblem of my love for thee!"

"Then give me but thy word—
A vow of love—'twere better yet,"
I orled: "who since has heard
Such vows, can ne'er forget!
If thou wilt give this plodge to me.
Nor ring nor rose I'll ask of thee!"

For spoken vows are empty breath,
Whose memory is in vain
ben passion perishoth;
If ever I lose my love for three,
My rows must all forgotten be!" No. Health of the "Then what," I asked, "wift then, O dearest! to thy lover give? | Nor ring, nor rose, nor you

May I from thee remive;
And yet, some symbol should there be
To typify thy love for me!" Then dropped her silvery voice
Unto a whisper soft and low.
"Here, take this gift—my choice—
The sweetast love can know!"
She raised her lead all lovingly.
And smiling, gave—a kins to me!
